

YELLOWSTONE, THE WONDER TRIP

North Coast Limited in the Rockies

EVERYBODY CHERISHES AMBITION TO MAKE TRIP TO YELLOWSTONE PARK

Yellowstone Is the One Strange Region Which Attracts Sight-seers From Every Continent and Land — Visitors From Every State

There is one trip in the world which everybody cherishes any ambition at all for travel desires to make and that is the trip to the Wonderland of the World—Yellowstone National Park.

That is the trip which the Bristol Courier has selected as the prize award for the young lady who wins the Better Times Contest being conducted by this newspaper and a group of merchants.

In all the globe, Yellowstone is the one strange region which attracts sightseers from every continent and every land. It numbers among its visitors people from every state in the Union, from every principality, republic and kingdom in the Old World, from Africa and South America and from the countries of Asia and the Orient. Nowhere else are there so many strange sights to see, so much to enjoy and so much to remember forever after.

Truly the Yellowstone trip will be "the event of a life-time" for the lucky young lady.

The country through which the winner will travel to and from the park will be full of interest. It will lead away up into the north, via St. Louis, to St. Paul, Minnesota. There it will turn westward over Minnesota Lake-land, cross the Dakota prairies, follow the route of march of General Custer, and trace the original Lewis and Clark trail of 1805 almost to the gateway of Yellowstone.

It will be cooler in the north and the air-conditioned comfort of North Coast Limited observation-club and dining cars will add to the luxury in which the Better Times winner will travel. Thousands of miles of travel—a wonderful opportunity for Better Times Contestants!

DEAD NEWSPAPER GETS STATE ADVERTISING PLUM IN BUCKS

The placing of the advertising of the list of mercantile taxpayers in Bucks county continues to keep the wires to Harrisburg hot with just as absurd results to date as were indicated before formal protest was registered with Secretary of Revenue H. Edgar Barnes against the plain illegality contemplated in his original insertion order.

The manner in which Secretary Barnes persists in trying to place the business contrary to the statute is capable of only one conclusion—some one is trying "to pull something" and has the aid of the Department of Revenue in the attempt.

The original order for inserting the advertising, the most luscious plum in the gift of the administration, was directed to the "Bucks County Post, of New Hope."

There being no such newspaper, the order was then directed to the Bucks County Times. There was no Times until today, providing the newspaper makes its promised appearance in spite of the fact that it has lost the business in question.

The third absurdity came last night when Secretary Barnes' department ordered the business handed to the Bucks County News—which ceased to exist last November.

The situation develops from the fact that the law defines a newspaper which may carry state business. This newspaper must be of general circulation and published continuously for six months at least prior to the insertion of the advertising.

None of the newspapers favored with the business by Secretary Barnes so far can qualify.

The Post never was; the Times was supposed to be born this afternoon, and the News died last November.

Just what those in control of the Democratic fortunes in Bucks county are trying to pull off is a matter of speculation and surmise.

There certainly is no occasion for placing state advertising in phantom newspapers projected by residents of New Jersey or in newspapers that long ago ceased to exist.

There are plenty of established newspapers in Bucks county eligible for this business.

BOY CHARGES DAD DID NOT TREAT HIM WELL

Took Knife With Him When He Fled, So As To Protect Mother

FATHER NOT IN COURT

DOYLESTOWN, June 22—Donald Compton, 18, of Feasterville, pleaded guilty in Bucks County Court to a charge of larceny of a penknife and $8 pennies that, he informed Judges Hiram H. Keller and Calvin S. Boyer, he had taken from his father's home before he ran away last March.

It was an unusual story told by young Compton, a good-looking lad with more than the average education in spite of the fact that he quit school in the ninth grade.

He told the Court that he ran away from home because his father "made it hot for him" and did not like him. He said that he never had a real chance in life and that he could not stand the treatment that his father gave him.

Many times, young Compton declared, his father threatened to shoot him because he protected his mother. Compton said that he had some good friends nearby who cared for him more than his dad and that at times he went to their home to stay.

"I got tired of the treatment when I was a kid, but hoped and prayed that I could live to grow big enough to protect my mother," Compton told the Judges.

"I was not going to take any more from my father, so I ran away on March 13, after crawling in a back window of the house and getting a long-bladed knife that he had so that he could not hurt mother. I stumbled over the $8 pennies and took them too. I didn't mean to steal anything."

"I started out and stopped the first night in Lansdale, where they put me up in the lock-up over night. I asked the cop if it was lawful to carry a knife with a long blade and he told me the legal length. I realized I was violating the law and tossed the knife away between Lansdale and Baltimore."

"Then I proceeded on my trip, getting rides wherever I could by truck. I went to Georgia, Texas, Oklahoma and came East again and landed in Pittsburgh, where I stayed in a transient camp. There I learned that

More and More

(The Commercial Bulletin, Boston, June 15, 1935)

Constitutional government is based upon justice, and laws are enacted to make men deal fairly with their neighbors, so that a rule of law may be substituted for the rule of the jungle where might makes right.

Among savages and in an absolute monarchy the chief or king has power to appropriate the property of his subjects, but the growth of democracy, in monarchies as well as in republics, has been curtailing the power of rulers for hundreds of years.

Parliamentary bodies have taken over the power to assess taxes, and in very few nations today is there a king who has much control over the laws that govern the people he is supposed to rule.

In progressive countries of Europe, as well as in our own land, for over a century statesmen have been active in the framing of laws to protect the weak from the strong. In the last 60 years we have had thousands of laws passed by Congress or by state legislatures to grant various rights to workmen that their employers are obliged to respect.

A man of property is regarded as strong, and a man without property is considered weak by our legislators, and in seeking to protect the weak from the strong they bear constantly in mind that many voters are poor and very few are rich, so the practical politician strives to win the favor of the men of small means, or of no property at all.

In this endeavor legislators lose sight of justice, for in many legislative bodies the members have shown alacrity in favoring laws to take wealth from its owners in order to give it to another class of voters.

The thief wants a new distribution of wealth, and he carries out his plan by stealing your property for his own use.

The socialist wants a new distribution of wealth, and under his plan nobody would be rich, for the state would own everything. Under plans of socialists and of the soviets they can make everybody poor, but they can not make everybody rich.

The President of the United States has many times advocated a greater distribution of wealth, and the way favored by politicians to accomplish this purpose is to take the wealth from those who own it.

A just income tax would impose the same rate of tax on each citizen's income, but our federal government has already enacted a law under which the maximum income tax rate is 63 per cent. And now they are clamoring for still higher rates of income taxes, gift taxes, and federal inheritance taxes.

In advocating a policy of "soak the rich" demagogues arouse class hatred, and men of wealth are discriminated against by legislation almost as if they were public enemies. The graduated income tax and the federal and state inheritance taxes have been so heavy that in the case of certain rich men the entire estates have been consumed by taxes, leaving nothing for the heirs, and yet the cry in Washington is for higher rates of taxes to effect a new distribution of wealth.

Wealthy men are able to make some resistance against the attempt to take their wealth from them, and one means of defence is found in the investment of large amounts of money in non-taxable bonds. The hundreds of millions that have been so invested in the past year might have been used by the owners to put many thousands of the unemployed to work if the capitalists had not been deterred by hostile legislation already enacted and the fear of further attacks upon industry embodied in bills now pending in Congress.

We do not feel the burden of a tax that somebody else has to pay, so it is but natural that politicians looking for sources of extra revenue should pick out the richest citizens to bear the load of extra taxation. The rich man is entitled to fair play as well as the war veteran and the man without a job, and when the effect of heavy graduated income taxes is seen, those who continually shout "soak the rich" may find that they are killing the goose that lays the golden egg.

THE WORLD'S HER OYSTER

Our grandparents tell us that almost all the girls of their youth used to stay at home and help do the housework, until they were married. Many families at that time thought there was something improper and eccentric about a girl who went out to work among the men.

Then came an age when many girls began to go out as shop or store or home workers, but they rarely went away from their home towns until they were married. Today, almost every girl, unless exceptional conditions keep her at home, chooses an occupation or profession. If she can't get a job in her home town, she searches the whole world for something to do.

Conditions still keep some girls at home, but they are often unhappy there. If their parents attempt to guide their conduct after they have become of age, they resent such dictation, and long for some opportunity to go out with the rest of their sex and live an independent life and make opportunities for themselves. The idea of depending on their parents is not generally popular among young women. They keenly desire their own money, and their chance to make their own lives.

The home staying woman of the former age was a charming bit of culture, refined and modest, but she was unfitted for the conflicts of life. Too much shielding made her a hot-house flower. Women have not suffered by the broader life they are leading, and their wider experience has taught them to take care of themselves, and they have become an infinitely greater power in the world.

KIDNAPPERS' PROFITS

Any person who thinks there is profit in kidnappings should read this paragraph from the story of developments in the Weyerhaeuser case:

"Waley said he was short-changed about $5,000, that he burned $4,000 because it was too hot for him to keep, spent $300 and buried $9,700," Hoover continued. (J. Edgar Hoover, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.)

Not much profit there!

All Waley got out of the kidnapping was the uncertain pleasure of spending $300; he now faces not less than 25 years in prison, and the death penalty if it is possible to bring about such a sentence in the courts.

Not much profit in kidnappings!

Always bawl out people by letter. By the time you get it written, you are no longer mad enough to mail it.

A 105-year-old San Franciscan who has voted for 20 GOP candidates for president calls himself a dyed-in-the-wool Republican. Such modesty! The old gentleman also is sun-fast and pre-sunk.

Boy Charges Dad Did Not Treat Him Well

my dad had a warrant out for me and I started home and gave myself up last week."

Compton said that when he arrived in Feasterville he met his father and was informed by him that he would not withdraw the charge against his son.

Trooper Peter Reilly, of the Morrisville sub-station, testified that he had talked to the boy's father and was informed by the father that he wanted his boy punished and did not want him at home any more.

The Court was informed that a well known resident of the Feasterville section is very well interested in young Compton and will take him in if the father does not agree to be a pal to his son in the future.

The Court directed, when they found that the boy's father did not have interest enough to be in court, that he appear in chambers today when the boy's case will be disposed of.

CHAPTER XXVII

Dinner over, back they went, herded laughingly by Schuyler into the library.

"You will live to stay out of the music-room and the billiard-room," he warned them. "Santa Claus may want them for his own private purposes tonight. You can use this room, the billiard-room, the conservatory, or any of the other rooms—only listen! While I think of it, any of your windows, but please—for the Lord's sake—have a heart, and close the doors on to your terraces. If you leave them open, the whole house will congeal overnight—particularly as there isn't a bedroom in the whole shack that doesn't open on to the terrace."

"We won't freeze you out," they promised him. "We'll keep those 'ole dehhil' terrace doors closed—see if we don't!"

"We were just settling down to coffee and liqueurs, when the butler came to Donetta."

"Mrs. Millbanks," he said. "There is a call on the phone from the telegraph station in the village. They have a message for you, and will not read it over the wire, unless you come in person."

"Donetta went to the telephone and answered the clipped, artificial question of the operator at the other end. This is Mrs. Millbanks speaking."

The voice parroted: "Wireless from mid-ocean—from the Tenyo Maru—to Mrs. Schuyler Millbanks—relayed from San Francisco—shall I read the message, madam?"

"Yes. Go ahead," Donetta was startled and impatient.

The voice read: "On my way to China, well heeled, don't worry. Love. Signature Gerry."

Slowly Donetta hung up the receiver, and walked back to join her guests, a puzzled frown marring her smooth forehead.

Schuyler met her at the door. "Anything serious, dearest? You look disturbed," he said tenderly.

"No—no—" she answered, her voice preoccupied. "I hardly know."

"Well! Forget about it," he told her. "I've got news that I think will please you! Roger Thornley just arrived. He's upstairs now, changing. Isn't that nice, sweet? He can tell us about Gerry."

"Yes," she repeated slowly. "Perhaps he can tell us about Gerry."

They rejoined their guests, and the arrival of the new member of the party was announced.

Roger Thornley put in his appearance hard upon the heels of his host, and was greeted with joyous acclaim by those who already knew him.

The evening went forward merrily, with chatter and games, well-lubricated by the best of drinks.

At a little past one thirty, Schuyler Millbanks suddenly clapped his hands for silence, and when he had the attention of everyone in the room, he said:

"I know that it's not considered exactly the right thing for the host to tell guests that it is time to retire. But tonight we are so liable to have an unexpected guest—as he is old, and rather particular in his ways, I am about to ask you all to call this an evening—for tomorrow morning you will very likely have to revert to childhood, and rise very early indeed."

"Who's the other guest, Schuyler?" they called. "The old one?"

"Santa Claus," he answered, in a completely serious tone.

Amid laughter and chat they broke up the games, and dispersed to their quarters, calling good-nights and wise cracks to each other down the long upper hall, until only one the doors had closed behind each well-dressed back.

Wilbur Renton hesitated at the head of the stairs, and whispered to Betty, under cover of the general chatter.

"I must see you, Betty. It's important—more important than you know."

"Sh!" she warned. "If I can, I'll meet you later, Wilbur—on the terrace—keep quiet now—it looks silly for us to be whispering, under the circumstances."

"No," he said. "Not on the terrace. It's too cold there. Make it the turret sitting-room on this floor, just above the conservatory—please."

CHAPTER XXVIII

Walking softly towards the stairs was the figure of a man. At the sound of her door opening, he turned, and Betty's wide eyes looked into the cheerful countenance of her host, Schuyler Millbanks.

"Anything wrong?" he asked.

"That's what I came to find out." She laughed in his relief. Then as she noticed that he had on a heavy mackinaw, "Is anything wrong? Are you going out into the snow at this hour?"

"Everything's just great," he assured her. "Couldn't be better. I thought all of you would be getting in your first siege with the sandman—so as to dream about Santa, and what he'll put on the Christmas tree for you to find in the morning."

He shook a playful finger at her. "Little girls should be extra good on Christmas Eve," he chided. "I put my own little girl safely to bed—her eyes as big as saucers in anticipation of what the dawn will bring her."

Casually he turned away and started to descend the staircase.

"Oh! Schuyler," Betty begged. "If you're going to be Santa Claus and surprise Donetta, please let me be in on it—let me help you. I don't feel a bit sleepy—really—let me help you trim the tree."

Millbanks laughed.

"What a child you are," he said. "The servants will attend to the tree—I'll put the gifts on later. I'm on my way to the kennels. One of my prize golden setters, Lass o' Millbanks, is having her first litter tonight." He smiled whimsically back at Betty. "And she'll feel more comfortable if I'm there."

He waved a gay hand in farewell and went on down the stairs.

Betty went back into her own room, a tender smile on her lips—Donetta was surely a lucky girl, she thought—a nice husband just couldn't be dreamed of than Schuyler Millbanks.

She shivered uncontrollably as she recalled those whispered conversations in the hall such a short time before.

In the dressing-room, Sucky was already prepared for sleep in her quaint old-fashioned white muslin night gown, high-necked and long-sleeved, a tiny lace frill framing her wrinkled black hands and face.

As Betty's eyes rested casually upon those hands, she paused.

"What's that you've got there, Sucky?" she asked.

"Oh! nothing, Miss Betty," Sucky held the little object out to her. "Jes' a little doll. You know, honey, when folks get old like me, dey has ideas—and dey likes some things more than others."

Betty took the little figure curiously into her hand. It was made from substance, which she did not recognize. It looked more like a raw potato that had turned dark from exposure to the air than anything she could think of. The doll was well carved. A man's figure, with a rope made of heavy thread braided around the throat, drawn tight.

"What on earth?" Betty puzzled. "What's that rope for, Sucky?"

Sucky laughed merrily.

"The rope, honey?" she repeated. "Why, that's jes' an idea of Sucky's. Sho now, honey, I jes' want to see how tight I kin draw that rope there, before the head jes' naturally drops right off."

Again she laughed.

"Why, you old executioner you!" laughed Betty fondly, and handed back the doll. So preoccupied was she, that she never noticed the penetrating gleam in the hooded eyes of the old woman.

The huge old gray stone house had been sunk in slumorous quiet for some time, when Betty was awakened from that first deep sleep that comes after emotional strain.

She sat bolt upright in bed, and listened. It seemed to her that someone had called her name in tones of agony—a man's voice.

"Betty! Betty!" it came again. "For God's sake come here! Oh! my God! What shall I do? Oh! My God!"

AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE

Is becoming a greater necessity every day. You would laugh at the man owning a $10,000 house and not carrying Fire Insurance. Yet how much more foolish it seems that the same individual should drive his car without insurance, when he is ten times more certain to have an accident with his car than he is to have a fire. For statistics show that one house out of eighty insured burns down, while one machine out of every eight has an accident. The argument frequently given of "I am judgment proof" is a poor one. No good citizen wants to think that he has injured a poor child who will suffer through life because he was not in a position to reimburse him for the injury. Another common argument is "can't afford." If we can afford to buy gas, tires, license tags, it is strange that we can't afford 5c a day for insurance, which sum is more than you need to insure your pleasure car in—

CASEYS MOVE UP INTO FOURTH PLACE IN LEAGUE

The Bristol Caseys took fourth place in the Bristol Twilight League last night by white-washing the Edgely A. C., 6-0, on Leedom's field. "Milt" Jones, with the aid of "Lefty" Whitaker did the trick for the Caseys.

Jones twirled the first six frames for the Caseys while Whitaker took up the burden in the seventh and retired the Edgely batsmen in quick order. Six of the Edgely seven safe blows were made off Jones while the other came while Whitaker was on the hill. However, a quick throw from J. Dougherty to McDevitt caught the runner off the sack in the last count.

The winners were credited with six hits but managed to bunt four of these in the first and sixth innings to count all their tallies. Paul Moore opened the game with a hit to left. J. McDevitt was hit with a pitched ball. Cooper bunted. Hunter fielded the ball and made a good throw to first but Palowez allowed the ball to roll out of his mitt. Moore crossing. Hagan struck out. On the "squeeze" play, J. Dougherty sacrificed and McDevitt counted. Cooper scored on "Bill" Dougherty's double to left. Hagan struck out.

The three run edge looked good but to make victory certain the McDevitt-men counted a trio of tallies in the sixth. Cooper started it with a single to right. Hagan was passed. The runners advanced on a balk. J. Dougherty flied out to Hunter. W. Dougherty hit to Kimble, whose throw to the plate was too late to get Cooper. Hagan singled past third base and when Walterick fumbled the ball in left, Hagan and W. Dougherty dented the home pentagon. J. F. Cooper flied out to left.

SEED PACKERS PUT FIRST GAME IN BAG

NEWTOWN, June 22—Howard Black held the Newtown A. A. team to one hit here last evening as the Landreth All-Stars of Bristol downed the home team, 7-1. It was the opening game of the season for the Landreth nine.

Black would have had a shut-out had it not been for some daring base-running by Campbell in the seventh. Campbell singled, advanced on two infield outs, and then proceeded to steal home to register the only Newtown tally.

The Landreth team hit the ball hard, making a total of thirteen safe hits off the combined hurling of Worthington and White. The All-Stars had men on base in every frame and scored in all except the first and seventh. Rockhill, Hines, Purcell and Barrett led the hitters with two bingles each.

"Intellectuals" of Sport

By BURNLEY

Prize-fighters are traditionally supposed to be uneducated lowbrows, but while this is still true in many cases, there are quite a few exceptions among present-day pugns. Barney Ross and Jimmy McLarnin are both highly intelligent young men who speak very good English and never say "dese" and "dose" and while Max Baer may be considered screwy in some quarters, it's a cinch that he's not the type of slow-witted "abyssal brute" that used to symbolize pugilists in the past.

Gene Tunney is, of course, the best known example of the new species of "cultured cauliflower," and the fact that Gene was invited by Prof. William Lyon Phelps to lecture at Yale on Shakespeare shows that Gene is not exactly a lame-brain, whatever his qualifications as a Shakespeare authority may be.

Another famous knuckle thrower who exercised his brain muscles as well as his biceps was old Mike McTigue, one-time light heavyweight champ, who was, and for all I know still is, quite a student of philosophy.

The latest leather pusher to go highbrow on us is none other than Fidel La Barba, ex-flyweight king, who has gone literary in a big way and is now writing stories for Cosmopolitan and other magazines. Fidel was always a bright lad, and I remember, when he was tossing knuckles, he always nursed an ambition to become a sport writer.

Other sports beside the prize ring have their quota of "intellectuals." Tennis has contributed several literary aspirants, among them being large William Tilden and Helen Jacobs. Big Bill has written a number of tennis articles and stories, and also writes poetry, some of which has been published. As a poet, Bill will never rival Shakespeare or even Eddie Guest, but at any rate he managed to get some of his verse in print.

Helen Jacobs has written several articles on her tennis career for the magazines, and admits that her big ambition is to write a novel.

Baseball's candidates for the sport world's brain trust include Moe Berg, White Sox catcher and linguist extraordinary, who speaks eleven or twelve different languages and is quite a student, and Johnny Broaca, young Yankee hurler, who spends his spare time delving into deep and dusty tomes of philosophy and history.

Bucks Sheep Owners Sell Their Wool Clip

DOYLESTOWN, June 22—At a meeting of the sales committee of the Bucks County Co-operative Wool Association, the high bid of William H. Grundy Company, Inc., was accepted for the 1935 wool clip of Bucks and Montgomery counties.

The bid was on a graded basis as follows:
28.25 cents per pound for medium; 23.25 cents for fine wool and rejects. The rejects will consist of burry fleeces and pulled wool, and should not alarm any producer, County Agent William F. Greenawalt explained.

The wool will be received at the Groff & Carwithin lumber yard, opposite the Reading passenger station, here, on Wednesday, June 26, between 9 a. m. and 1 p. m. (D. S. T.) W. B. Connell, of State College, will grade the wool and explain to each producer the reasons for each grade.

Each individual's wool will be weighed and he will be given a slip. After he receives this slip, no correction can be made pertaining to the weight. Each farmer pooling will be permitted to observe the scales as his wool is weighed.

Farmers will receive their checks in payment of the wool within seven days after receipt of wool, less handling charges of approximately one-half cent per pound.

All wools not tied with paper twine will be discounted one cent per pound. County Agent Greenawalt suggested that wool growers tie the wool before bringing it in. Twine can be procured from John C. Thompson, secretary of the sales committee of the Bucks County Wool Growers' Association or County Agent Greenawalt. The use of binder twine is forbidden.

This pool includes Montgomery county and is a co-operative organization. All wool producers, whether large or small, are invited to take advantage of the pool.

The committee believes that the price offered by William H. Grundy Company, Inc., is the highest obtainable for the 1935 clip.
